JUSTIN MAYO / THE SEATTLE TIMES

The Seattle Times compiled this list using OSHA inspection data based on the North American Industry Classification System that gun ranges use to categorize themselves. The Times began with the seven most likely NAICS codes for shooting organizations, then paired down and confirmed the data by calling each gun range or checking its website. Keyword searches identified additional ranges that were coded under the wrong industry, such as locksmith and shoe store. The final database of 201 gun ranges inspected from 2004 through 2013 includes more than 1,900 violations. To determine which of the violations were lead-related, The Times looked up hundreds of federal and state occupational safety standards. Military and law-enforcement ranges are not included in the analysis unless open to the public. Monitoring inspections are also not included because they are often used to check on abatement progress from previous violations.
